How China Built Its Tech Prowess: A Focus on STEM

FROM FIRST BUSINESS PAGE

A once-a-decade meeting of China's Communist Party leadership chose scientific training and education as one of the country's top economic priorities. That goal received more attention in the meeting's final resolution than any other policy did, except strengthening the party itself.

China will "make extraordinary arrangements for urgently needed disciplines and majors," said Huai Jinpeng, the minister of education. "We will implement a national strategy for cultivating top talents."

 $A\,majority\,of\,undergraduates\,in$ China major in math, science, engineering or agriculture, according to the Education Ministry. And three-quarters of China's doctoral students do so.

By comparison, only a fifth of American undergraduates and half of doctoral students are in these categories, although American data defines these majors a little more narrowly.

China's lead is particularly wide in batteries. According to the Australian Strategic Policy Institute, 65.5 percent of widely cited technical papers on battery technology come from researchers in China, compared with 12 percent from the United States.

Both of the world's two largest makers of electric car batteries, CATL and BYD, are Chinese.

China has close to 50 graduate programs that focus on either battery chemistry or the closely related subject of battery metallurgy. By contrast, only a handful of professors in the United States are working on batteries.

Undergraduates in the United States are becoming interested in battery research, said Hillary Smith, a battery physics professor at Swarthmore College. But, she added, "they are going to compete for a very few spots if they want to do battery research, and most will have to choose something else."

The roots of China's battery successes are visible at Central South University in Changsha, a city in south-central China and a longtime hub of China's chemicals in-nearly 60,000 undergraduate and graduate students on an extensive, modern campus. Its chemistry department, once in a small brick building, has moved to a sixstory concrete building with labyrinths of labs and classrooms.

In one lab, which is filled with glowing red lights, hundreds of batteries with new chemistries are tested at the same time. Electron microscopes and other advanced equipment occupy other rooms.

"For us, the experimental equipment is sufficient to meet everyone's testing needs," said Zhu Fangjun, a doctoral student.

Peng Wenjie, a professor, has set up a battery research company nearby that employs more than 100 recent doctoral and master's program graduates and over 200 assistants. The assistants work in relays for each researcher so that the testing of new chemistries and designs continues 24 hours a day.

"There are many people on site to do the tests, so the efficiency is very high," Professor Peng said.

China's broadening expertise in manufacturing has created an active debate in other countries, notably the United States, over whether to invite Chinese companies to build factories or whether to try to duplicate what China has accomplished.

"If the U.S. wants to build up a supply chain quickly, the best way is to invite Chinese companies, and they will set it up very quickly and bring technology," said Feng An, the founder of the Innovation Center for Energy and Transportation, a nonprofit research group in Beijing and Los Angeles.

Manufacturing makes up 28 percent of China's economy, compared with 11 percent in the United States. China's hope is that investments in scientific education and research will translate into efficiency gains that will help lift the entire economy, said Liu Qiao, the dean of the Guanghua School of Management at Peking University.

"If you have a large manufacturing sector," he said, "it's easy to improve productivity levels."

China's manufacturing prowess has become a geopolitical issue, however. The government subsidies and policies that have helped fuel the factory boom have left many other countries wary of buying more of China's exports.

The European Union has imposed formidable provisional tariffs on electric vehicles from China. In the United States, which has also used tariffs to effectively block China's E.V. companies, political and commercial pressure has impeded ventures with Chinese battery makers.

Still, China's battery companies are looking for ways to produce in the United States for the American market. Building and equipping an electric-car battery factory in the United States costs six times as much as in China, said Robin Zeng, the chairman and founder of CATL.

The work is also slow — "three times longer," he said in an inter-

The United States still leads China in overall research spending, in terms of dollars spent and also in terms of the share of each country's economy. Research and development represented 3.4 percent of the American economy last year after several years of increases.

But China is at 2.6 percent and rising.

"What happens when China passes the U.S. in R&D and they have the manufacturing base?" asked Craig Allen, the president of the U.S.-China Business Council, which represents American companies doing business in China.

Google Unveils Pixel 9 Series In Bid to Top Apple's iPhone

Bv NICO GRANT

MOUNTAIN VIEW, CALIF. - When Google released its first Android smartphone in 2008, the company's founders slid onstage in roller skates. One of them, Larry Page, said the device was as advanced as a computer had been a few years before.

On Tuesday, executives left the skates behind but kept to the tone of that pitch: Google crammed all the cutting-edge technology it could into the latest Pixel phones. The devices are chock-full of artificial intelligence, to let users engage with a conversational assistant, edit people into photos and search for information found in their screenshots, the company said in blog posts.

Google is hoping the features will help the four new phones including the Pixel 9, Pixel 9 Pro and the double-wide Pixel 9 Fold finally overcome consumer apathy to its smartphone ambitions. It is Google's latest attempt to make a splash in a smartphone market dominated by its partner Samsung, as well as by Apple, which has already detailed the A.I. capabilities coming to the next generation of iPhones.

Google's effort to make itself a significant player in consumer hardware has been an uphill climb. It has about 5 percent of the smartphone market in the United States, and generally less than that in other major markets, like Britain, Germany and India, according to Statista, which com-

The company gets most of its revenue from advertising on its search engine and YouTube video platform. Last week, a federal judge ruled that Google had acted illegally to maintain a monopoly in online search, in a decision that could upend the company's lucrative business model. Google said it would appeal the decision and "remain focused on making products that people find helpful.

Google has tried to use the excitement around generative A.I. chatbots and features to reset the competition. In April, Sundar Pichai, Google's chief executive, announced that he was merging its teams that develop Android with those that engineer Pixel devices and other hardware. The hope was that combining the two would make it easier to incorporate more A.I. into the products and speed up decision-making.

All the phones are available for preorder on Tuesday. Pixel 9 and Pixel 9 Pro XL will launch Aug. 22 and the other two on Sept. 4.

Google suggested that its A.I. features would arrive sooner than Apple's, which said it would add A.I. to its smartphones by this fall. Rick Osterloh, Google's senior vice president who oversees hardware and Android, said he understood "people's skepticism" when it comes to the rollout of A.I.

"There have been so many promises, so many 'coming soons' and not enough real-world helpfulness when it comes to A.I.," Mr. Osterloh said, "which is why today, we're getting real. We have lots of live demos of products, features and A.I. experiences that are starting to ship with Android and our new Pixel devices."

Google said that the Pixel 9 Pro Fold, which has two screens one outside and a wider screen when unfolded — would bring users "the best of Google's A.I." The device starts at $1,799, the company said, while the rest of the lineup starts from $799 to $1,099, depending on size and specifica-

While Google's share of the smartphone market is small, it has recently made some strides. The company's 4.6 percent of the smartphone market in 2023 was up from 3.6 percent a year earlier, according to data from the research firm IDC.

Besides the new phones, the company showcased the Pixel

Watch 3 and Pixel Buds Pro 2, headphones that incorporated the company's Tensor A1 computer chips for the first time. Google said they were designed for its A.I. and advanced audio processing, so users could have clearer calls and hear less outside noise.

The company is hoping that its latest product blitz will be helped by its A.I. It has incorporated its Gemini chatbot, formerly named Bard, into the Android operating system used by billions of people.

One service, Gemini Live, will allow phone users to have audio conversations with the chatbot and ask complex questions or learn what kinds of jobs might be suited to their skill-set and degree, the company said. It is avail-to Gemini starting today. Google said it would give phone customers a free year of its premium A.I. plan, for access to more features. Gemini will also connect with new apps in the coming weeks, including Calendar, Tasks and more features on YouTube Music, to make it a more helpful assistant.

Google acknowledged that all these efforts would bring A.I. deeper into users' private lives, and said that it would safeguard their data by not sharing it with other companies, and give users control over what Gemini can have access to.

"We're infusing A.I. into everything we do," Sameer Samat, Google's president of the Android Ecosystem, wrote in a blog post. "In order for A.I. to be truly helpful, it should naturally fit into our everyday lives, and the best place to experience that is on your Android device."
